The roof of the brick-edged veranda at my grandparents' home is supported by monumental, terracotta columns. Standing beside them overlooking the gardens, a trip down memory lane is always a warming interlude to the day.

These baked-earth pillars routinely formed the backdrop for our childhood games, played on shallow steps leading to the garden. Lining these steps, the clay-potted (terracotta), double-bloom roses - a reminder of my grandmother's prize-winning garden - were often a point of disaccord. Their thorny silhouettes, marking the parameters of our play field, worried our grandmother on two accounts: a possible injury to us, and then to the roses, that had taken years of pruning and fertilising to attain their splendour.

This dullai is a reminder of simple days, happy times, and the veranda with 'mitti kay satoon' (terracotta columns)

The quilt blocks are detailed using the running-stitch - a traditional hand-quilting technique, reminiscent of the hand embroidery on Sindhi rallis - that binds the two cotton layers into a cohesive whole.

Lightweight (two-layered) patchwork quilt / Dullai*

*The Urdu word 'dullai' when translated specifically means, 'two-layered'. I grew up in a city with four seasons, and during spring time, with the warming weather, we would put away our duvets and use our dullais for a light cover when resting.
